Dear Hiring Team,

Leading Bleacher Report Sports engineering means owning a consumer product that millions of fans reach for every day across web, iOS, Android, and platform services — and being accountable for it being fast, reliable, and continuously better. That combination of large-scale consumer engineering, hands-on architectural leadership, and operational discipline is exactly the work I have been doing for the past several years, and the reason this role stood out to me.

At GoTo Foods I lead engineering and architecture for a multi-brand consumer business serving millions of customers. I delivered a unified platform that consolidated seven independent brand apps and websites across web and mobile, architected the subscription platform behind new consumer business models, and drove roughly 40% faster time-to-market and 30% better uptime. Just as important as the features was the operational excellence underneath them: standardized monitoring, alerting, and incident-management practices, resilient event-driven services, and observability that let the team catch and resolve issues before customers felt them. This is the same reliability bar a real-time sports audience demands during a March Madness or Champions League moment, when the traffic is spiky and the tolerance for downtime is zero.

I lead as a player-coach. I have built and grown senior engineering organizations of managers and individual contributors, developed leaders underneath me, and set ambitious strategy — but I have also stayed hands-on through periods of attrition and transformation, stepping directly into design, architecture, and delivery when the team needed it. I work best at the seam between engineering and the business, partnering with Product, Design, and Marketing to decide what to build and then holding the org accountable to ship it with quality. Influencing across teams without relying on authority, and translating between executives and engineers, has been central to every role I have held.

I would bring that blend of consumer-scale engineering, operational rigor, and people leadership to a product built for people who genuinely care about the outcome on the field. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss how I can help Bleacher Report Sports scale its platform, raise its reliability bar, and keep delivering experiences worthy of its fans.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Gautam Velpula
